Get Me to the Church on Time

by Ann Bogle

I was hoping for a language-free moment, a moment to discourage the word.

I was, as you know, a prisoner to my tongue, could bite it.

In my upper room, a sermon was playing about sundry. I hid on the stairs, listening, talking back to it, but it couldn't hear me because it was talking. I let it.

What choice did I have?

It was a good one, what to do with old guns: bury them in the cellar, one by one.

I grew attached to my upper air, slept with a pillow near the ground, it was no basement, anymore; they'd blasted the bottom half of her, left me to untie my shoes from a distance of seventy feet — that was because I have a cut. Sorry,

I said, meaning it, but it was nothing to make up for. Next time try taking it.

Available online at $\mbox{\it whttp://fictionaut.com/stories/ann-bogle/get-me-to-the-church-on-time>}$

Copyright © 2013 Ann Bogle. All rights reserved.