

Salt Thought

by Bill Yarrow

The custard of eternity is scooped into the quantum cone of knowledge and drips out the bottom one lifetime at a time.

Sunburned man stands on the boardwalk of emotion watching the tourists of the future eye the bruised merchandise of the past.

Meanwhile, the bronze present undoes the blouse of the impossible imagining ice floes and Tiki lights and sushi bars.

Is there no escape from raw thinking?
Is there no respite from rash imagining?

Like a discarded tub of fries on the fringe of the pristine beach, the lax head lies prey to the cawing clawing seagulls of salt thought.
