

The Gate Before

by Darryl Price

You were always going to connect the dots.
I was always going to overfill a bucket with poems. You would eventually drive off waving your hand like a star on a spring. I'd shoulder up another notebook for the walk. My hand would rather hold a pencil. Yours would accept a kiss from a perfect stranger. You were invited to walk in gardens. I was given the gate before we even arrived. You somehow managed to change into a diamond, but in a golden glued-down seat. I was more or less a ruby

in a skull's eye-socket and yet we found a way to laugh.

That's all I know of this thing. Now you sit somewhere outside the wild feelings blowing around in my heart, the photograph of an ocean entering a dark green tunnel of another new amazing day. There's nothing more to say that wouldn't take away its real voice and replace it with something less worth listening to.

Bonus poems:

This isn't just another perfectly wasted day

To me. From here for instance it's Still bursting full of little yellow flowers Growing out and over the rocky walls

And with wild zooming honey bees barely Missing your face as they chase the Alluring fragrance to its central sticky source.
The soft sky is like a long

Silk covered road leading somewhere into a Faraway dream. I breathe it all in And smile. And in the middle of All that free wondering I'm striding all Alone down a leaf strewn bike path Listening to a bunch of noisy insect Camps talking over each other about the End of this particular Summer's time on The yearly Autumn stage. A few butterflies spark And wave as they tumble past on Their somersaulting way, hurrying to the secret Mystic summit of their ancient societies. Perhaps They'll come up with a clever butterfly Way to save the planet from disappearing Before I'm no longer able to participate.

One can always hope. There's no smoke

In the air today. I don't know If that's a good thing or a Bad, but I'm taking it as a Sign for now of many miracles to come.

These

things are yours to avoid answering. Although you hear me well enough to assume any action taken is to mean something's spoken, our connection doesn't have to get any deeper than it already is, that'd only be deceptive. I've reached you, I haven't found you.

These are buds to awaken.

Whatever happens after that is a harvest as old as time. You shall be given a glimpse into the heart of a color, a memory will be made into a journey. But don't spend too much dream power on talking with ghosts. They'll only want to haunt you in the end, that's their nature, yours is to finish going through without finishing yourself in the progress. These are yours to float away now. I won't do it. You are my last attempt at modernism any way. These are yours because I am yours and because we've come so very far so alone.

