

Grunion Fishing

by Ed Higgins

"Of course, most of the things I look back on fondly I never actually experienced." —Jon Favreau

As spilled on a sandy Corona del Mar beach both in moonlight and starlight so lovely and strangely sad as if receding still on the waves there in lost time or no time at all except for nostalgia now, or as it actually happened maybe those flickerings of pale silver on thousands of grunion making the whole surf-pounded beach alive with the magic incandescence of slender wriggling fish.

And we two once waiting under bluish moonlight at high tide that long summer's night ago while giddy in the crashing waves with scooping up whole handfuls of slippery small fish into buckets bright with overflowing moon.

Using flashlights so as not to scare the fish watching the female arching her body as her tail sinks deep into the fluid sand while the male curls around her milt flowing down her silvery sides and belly fertilizing buried eggs beneath.

Then later wrapped in one another's arms listening to the sound of ourselves pounding in our veins as the waves recede.

Overwhelmed ever after by the ability to catch starlight's incandescence ourselves: far-traveling light and flecks of photon stars which must stay momentarily or forever in the mind.

All beneath the spawning of that bright above us sky on a warm California beach.
