

Summer's smack

by Kitty Boots

straight-line winds whip the tendrils of gourds clinging to the smokehouse, zinnias defer and later give up, bowing with heavy heads a staccato plop on a hydrangea leaf they dance water runs off the roof in a metal bucket clouds clot the horizon all day, whispers of thunder, listen

rescue the laundry from an additional rinse, they're dry gather jeans and T-shirts by the armful and still stop to smell them one more walk around the gardens, edged just today, crabgrass, sneaky, luxuriant, finds it's place sometimes an asset, holding moisture in the ground, but greedy a tiny jewel of a tree frog on every alocasia leaf, a crack of thunder that shakes the house ozone, a freshening, as the hair stands up on my arms

