PTSD

by Larry Strattner

Sally knew,

when she heard the roux of words, once said, which led me to memories of Mogadishu. I reached the place and traveled through, producing dreams, which on review sent me screaming all anew, coughing up those faces who wanted to bid me harsh adieu, rife with pain and blood, my limbs askew, with background music on kazoo. Bullets flew, and I could not construe the locus of the battle, nor who, might fire the bullet, from the blue to catch me, standing in the queue for hell, or an equivalent to, to answer for things I did, or didn't, do for any, or for all, of you.
