American Passage

by Philip F. Clark

The moon, a cataract cloaked in its charcoal fog, slowly seeps among the trees; night's unguent. Its glance is constant and white, its arc known. I watch its brow of bone with constant wonder.

The long, slow funeral of America is taking its time; its pallbearers' hands strain heavy with the weight.

The caisson creaks forward, the horse sweats, riderless. The widows are not surprised.