The Empty Bed

by Bill Yarrow

The middle of the heavy bed was empty.

They were people who liked to sleep on edges and tug on covers. Each night enacted the tufted tussle of love and redacted the dreams of the day. Each night fleshed out the spooky skeleton of living together and amalgamated the twin incorporation of souls. But by day the birds of prey were in control. Auburn hawks and taut harriers crisscrossed the kitchen and family room. Bright falcons nested in the cracks of the cathedral ceilings. Every closet had its owl. One day an eagle crashed through the screen door. That scared away the buzzards. The craven mother got the shotgun but the eagle fled with two of the children in its beak.
