

I'm Going Either Way

by Peter Erich

Will you join me in the romance of heat lightning, boiling the reservoir with its strobe lights, Will you join me on a lavender farm that is folding over its scent and creating a bowl of casual sitting, Will you join me kneeling in a Homegoods parking lot, Will you join me when I am alone where the people were supposed to gather.

Come with me on an adventure and trust me to point out the parallel beauty of two fighters orbiting each other like hummingbird courting with flitters, because I am fucking waiting and waiting and waiting for you to join me and enjoy me but most of all I am wanting for you to walk willingly and enthusiastically into our future because still-waters rot.

The big fat Buddha is invisible and preserved in the crease of my hand, in a grip, in a damage, in a wildfire, in an oath, and we ignore it in a way in-which we kick the rock down the road until we become the rock, and we orbit our own lack of presence to each other, sitting in the blue light of our iPhones, in a state of meditative distain but sticking it out 'cause we said I do on one hot day in June.
